ACTUALLY

by Gordon Atkinson

A dog park in Houston

A shitty Jesus book

A shared moment

Toby and I spend 2-3 hours a day in dog parks. It's my new nature walk and meditation time, having left the beautiful Kingdom of La Mancha, where Toby and I ran free in nature with the foxes and wild animals. Now Toby is a rare and interesting breed, a Manchester Terrier. It is doubtful you'll ever see one unless you go to a dog show. He is a beautiful alpha terrier as well, which means he bristles with energy. He looks and acts like a tiny Doberman Pinscher, just 12 inches high, and people want to know about him.

Accordingly, someone asks me about Toby almost every time I go to the dog park. And there must be something about me, because four or five times a week I find myself in conversations about life with random Houstonians, our only common ground being this particular dog park.

Ten days ago a young woman was sitting next to me reading a book. Toby began pestering her dog to play, and we were observing this together and chatting when she began to speak in earnest. Within five minutes I learned that she has been going to churches, randomly, hoping someone will tell her what this guy JESUS, whom she has been hearing about her whole life, actually said.

She used the word “actually.” She said she just wanted to know what Jesus ACTUALLY said. Actually was this young woman’s word, and she said it a lot. She could tell she was getting a bunch of bullshit about Jesus at churches. She was reading bits of the gospels and she could feel that something was off. She had this idea that for some reason, getting at what Jesus actually said was this enormous and difficult task. And she was getting frustrated.

My eyes dropped to the book she was holding. It was a generic and smarmy Jesus book; I could tell that by the cover. Then I read the title and groaned. It was written by a guy who shits hallmark cards every Sunday morning in front of a live studio audience. You can buy his books at Costco, Walmart, and in the foyer of his church. It is the last church in the city of Houston I would send her to.

And it sits five minutes from our dog park.

I have to look away and wipe my eyes because they're filling with tears, and I'm worried one might break free and run down my cheek. Before me is an intelligent woman in her 20s, and she is forming her inner world RIGHT NOW. Right here in front of me. And this is the inner world that will take her all the way to her death, roughly half a century after I die. This bright young soul wants to know, please, if the Man from Galilee had anything to say that might help her navigate life in AD 2026.

So this particular "God Dammit" is a straight up prayer and does not count as cursing. Ask any theologian; they'll tell you.

I couldn't hear her because I was imagining her pulling into a giant parking lot, exiting her car and surging forward with the crowds into the carnival atmosphere of this particular megachurch. Every liturgy, every prayer, every song, and every blessing will assure her that Jesus is her boyfriend, and he will shower her life with material blessings now and later in heaven if only she shows faith. Faith as defined by the man who wrote the book in her hands.

She's too smart to fall for it, but that's the problem. After a few weeks of trying she will leave, and that will be it for her and Jesus. She will never know the truth about what he taught and thought and felt and believed in. And that would be fine. Except SHE WANTS TO KNOW. Her tender curious soul wants to know what Jesus had to say.

Of course she does.

And I knew in that moment there was no way I could...not get involved. My SELF, my ME, my SOUL, Gordon could not NOT get involved. Oh I wanted to not be involved. So badly I wanted it. But I knew there was no way I was going to be able to not.

So instead I said this quietly to myself.

God Dammit. I guess it's gonna have to be me.
